

Royal Horticultural Society. Voi. XXXI. 1905-1906. VEGETATIVE SPORTS AND FLORAL FREAKS. By the Rev. Professor G. Hbnslow, M.A., F.L.S., V.M.H. [Lecture given on March 14, 1905.] All plants apparently have the power to vary under altered conditions of life. In nature this power shows itself in response, if not in useful adaptations, to the environment. We thus find not only a peculiar facies, or a general and similar physiognomy characteristic of aquatic, desert, maritime, and other groups of plants respectively, hut that their internal anatomy corresponds with their external appearances. When wild plants are submitted to cultivation in a prej)ared and highly nutritious soil, they as a rule soon show sjme differences of structure; and when they have been long cultivated, the number of varieties may become very great; as of all the cabbage tribe, which originated from the single species, Brassica oleracea, of our chalk cliffs. Now, these variations appear to arise in two ways. They may be slow in coming, so that when the cultivator sees some slight alteration in the offspring, he isolates it and carefully selects the best out of the seedlings, which show the peculiarity, till at last he has established a new strain or race in, as an average, about five or six years. Sometimes, however, a more marked variation appears suddenly, either among the seedlings or upon one branch of a plant which is otherwise normal. This may occur in the stems, foliage, flowers, or fruit. When it occurs on a growing plant, or as a seedling, it is called a sport, and is due to bud-variation. If it be cut off, it can give rise to a plant, from which cuttings can be taken, and so the peculiarity can be perpetuated and multiplied. A very great number of shrubs with variegated foliage and flowers of different colours have been permanently secured in this way. Sometimes, but not generally(Typographical errors above are due to OCR software and dont occur in the book.)
